

Equality In Today's Society

Quite honestly, I don't think equality can be achieved. It's purely against nature, and most people know what happens when you try to challenge and/or change nature. I mean, why do house cats still fly all over the place trying to catch something, and why are they so good at it? It's pure instinct. Just like it's human instinct to strive for greatness.

For some reason, gender or any other sort of equality is on top of the "almighty chart for a better life". I just don't understand it. Men are better at doing single tasks, while women are better at organizing and multitasking. I mean sure, do whatever you want to, just don't blame society and it's inequality if something goes wrong. What you can blame is evolution, preach genocide, kill all humans, creating an equal opportunity for everyone, and you'll be a-ok.

Final dose of honesty – I could not care less about tit for tat, bish for bosh etc. Gender does not dictate that. What does impact wages, attitudes and everything else, however, is our way of thinking. That is the major tripping stone of society. We teach women not to get raped, not men not to rape. We think that women are more caring while men are more involved in their work etc and here's the catch – in most cases it's proven to be right. Thus we have roles for genders, for it is the way we think.

To wrap this up – to achieve equality, would be to change the way an entire species thinks, and, while that would be impressive as hell, it's virtually impossible. Most men will adapt male roles, while women will women's.
